THE JUDGMENT.

He'd always been a regular had one, he till he met with a cleverer chap than him, be taxed to its full capacity. The home and together they did more than one had was built at a cost of $18,000 and is fitted that made it worth while for him to hang afflicted members of the order, around there above a bit.

"It's a first class job," says he to our man here. "If we pull it off, it's idleness and the fat of the land for the rest of our born days. Are you on?"
"I'm on," says our man like the brute he is, never so much as asking what it is he's on in.

The house was called Chudleigh abbey. and it seems it was en old house, all over ivy and crospers, and an old lady lived Fellows' hall. there with a young nephew and a pretty some sort of lovemaking when a young | diem. man and his pretty cousin live under one roof. So there was, so there was. And and 9,024 past grands in good standing. their sort of lovemaking was the marrying sort. The question was popped, and the day was named, and then my young sir must needs get the family diamonds out of the bank to see how his sweetheart looked in them. He thought she looked sweet in them, you may be sure, and he gave them to her claim for fees. to keep, just telling her not to let any one know she'd got them till he'd got a safe worth $25,000, acquired since July, 1802, to keep them in. So she takes them up A per capita tax of $2 per member is to her room, and she hides them. he thought and she thought no one knew about them diamends, but I don't need to change their addresses without its being known somehow to more than one and more than two. And among those that knew were our man and his mate.

Well, they meant to have the diamonds. and they laid their plan, and there was two things that made their plan to easy to work. First, the young lady slept in a room at the farend of a long passage, with no one near her. It was the oldest part of the bouse, and she liked it because it was "so remartie." You know what young ladles be, sir! application. ext, the young gentleman, what always slept at home, was to sleep at the inn the night before the wedding. You know, sir, it's a custom with gentlefolks. So the plan was that on the night before the wedding, when there was only the women in the house, our men was to climb up the lvy and creep into our young lady's room and take the diamonds.

"It'll take me some time to find where she's hid them." he says to the other chap, so I'd better make the girl safe first." It was decided that our man was to ge right away for a week, so that there mightn't be any suspicion, and when he came back his mate would meet him at a change was wanted in the plan. If his of the order. mate didn't meet him, he was to go to the house at once. So he climbed no one night and filed the window bars nearly through and got all | diction. ready, and then he went away. After a week he came back. It was a very dark night. He waited a quarter of an hour by the old wall, but no one came, so be took his knife in his reeth and climbed up the lvy, going very slow and quiet. The bars were just as he had left them. He took one out very gently and laid it down and got into the room. It was very, very dark and smelled of and campuor, like a chemist's shop. He listened for the girl's breathing to guide him to the bed, but he heard nothing. Presently, feeling about, his hand touched the bedpost. Then he wraps his red cotton handkerchlef round his hand to put over her mouth, and he takes his knife in the other hand and feels for her face and pulls the sheet off her neck. She never moved, and it was done in a minute! Then he lays down his wet knife on the bed and strikes a match quite at his case

He lights a candle that stands by the bed hend and then sees the bed and what's on orphans, $728.41. it, and he gives a yell that fetches every soul in the house awake, and he goes off then and there, stark, raving, screaming, mad. The sight of what be meant all of the United States? along to do? Not it! Conscience? Not a bit of it! Sheer fright at the sight of what he'd done and hadn't meant to do.

'The candle showed him the bed—all a mass of white flowers-and what was ly ing on it under the white sheet had laid there dead long afore he come a nigh the place. I've heard say as corpses can't bleed. Well, all I know is-well, I won't say any more about that part of it, eir, if you don't like it. It ain't pleasant even to hear about, and the sight of it sent 'lm clear off 'is head. It was a corpse's throat he'd cut, the blundering, murdering villain, and when the servants run in with lights they found hlm lying across the bed foot, foaming at the mouth and mad as a batter. If he'd had any sense left for thinking, he would not he' known what to think, but this is what really had happened. The other chap-once our man was out of the waythinks to have a try for the diamonds off his own bat, but meanwhile the young lady at the abbey'd found out the filed window bars, and when he tried it on the young master and the under gardener was ready for him and took him with the knife in his hand, bending over the empty bed. Thinks he, t'other chap shan't get off.

then, neither, so off he goes to jail, leav-ing his mate to be copped when he comes back to try it on according to agreement And in jatl he tuened funky and choked himself with his belt, for there was other things against him, besides their having found out he was the Peckham mystery. And no one in the abbey expecting may more visitors through the window they didn't have the bars mended, but a silly maid who's frightened out of her wits sticks them up again to look like they did And how come the young lady to be dead already? Why, bless your soul, sir, didn't I tell you? It wasn't the young lady at all. It was the old housekeeper, as had been afling this long time and had gone off sudden with the turn the first chap gave her when he screnmed as he was took. And they laid her out in that room, being farthest from the other rooms. And if he'd had an ounce of pluck our man might ha' got away, but it's my be-lief he wasn't meant to. The judgment takes felk queer ways sometimes. - San Francisco Wave.

In the south the giving of long credits to the hardware and other trades is passing away. The old custom of giving a six months' note gave way to that of four months, and this has now evolved into the custom of one of 30 or 60 days. The long oredits in the south were the result of its raising one crop, and that being marketed slowly one person had to wait upon an other. - Hardware.
